In today's tech-savvy world, smartphones have become an extension of ourselves, carrying our contacts, messages, locations, and even financial information. But this also makes them a prime target for malicious tracking and surveillance. Suspicious that someone may be tracking your device? Here's how to spot the signs and protect yourself.

Unusual Battery Drain: It could be a sign that a tracking app is running in the background, continuously collecting and transmitting your data.

Unexplained Data Usage: Many spyware apps consume a lot of data to send the tracked information back to the source.

Overheating Without Cause: While smartphones get warm with heavy use, unexplained overheating, especially when idle, could indicate hidden apps using power-intensive features like GPS tracking.

Strange Background Noises During Calls: Odd background noises, clicks, or static on your calls may mean your calls are tapped or recorded.

Random Reboots or Delays: Tracking software may cause system instability, leading to sudden reboots, app crashes, or slower performance.

Unknown Apps Installed: Spyware often installs itself secretly, so check your app list regularly. Any app you don't recognize could be
